

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

First I would like to thank David Cubitt. For years he sent me hundreds of extracts from Norwich newspapers, and these provided the bed-rock on which this study is founded. Despite computerisation I cannot bring myself to part with the shoe-box stuffed with slips of paper covered with his familiar hand-writing. Next I must thank Philip Howard, who has trodden much of the territory that I have covered. His time-frame was earlier, but overlapped mine, and our shared interest resulted in an extended correspondence. Clive Wilkins-Jones and his staff at the Norfolk Heritage Centre were helpful beyond the call of duty and came to regard me as part of the furniture in their reading room. Staff at the Norfolk Record Office and at The National Archives were unfailingly helpful and courteous. The Earl of Leicester allowed me access to the Holkham Hall archives and Christine Hiskey, the Holkham archivist, made frequent flights from her eyrie on the top floor to let me in and give me her guidance when I had recovered from the ascent. Lord and Lady Walpole gave me generous access to the Wolterton Hall archives. Mr and Mrs Simon Gorton allowed me to disorganise their house in the interests of photography, and the photographer, John Humberstone, is still on speaking terms despite my getting lost when driving him there and again on the way back.

John Evan Bedford, Lindsay Campbell, Gillian Westell, Guy Savill, Paul Goodley, Bill Cotton and Norma Watt were all extremely helpful in providing me with photocopies, photographs and scans of trade cards and furniture, and Keith Pinn alerted me to the existence of Mike Hicks's splendid archive of documented furniture. My grateful thanks to them both. Jeremy Garfield-Davis provided me with beautiful photographs of the Samuel Sharpe chairs, together with extensive documentation.

Professor Martin Biddle kindly allowed me to use the Historic Towns Trust 1792 map of Norwich, whilst my son, Daniel (joi, cm), provided the map of Norfolk towns. Local historian, Michael Begley, was very helpful with his advice, particularly over the 'Norfolk in the Eighteenth & Early Nineteenth Century' section. Valuable help was also provided by Professor Richard Wilson, Adam Bowett, Shirley and Keith Howell and John Martin Robinson.
